TEST TEXT

Do you ever send or receive e-mails? Are you on the Internet a lot? Do you go to chat rooms? Did you know there are rules of behavior for all of these? The rules are called Netiquette. They can be applied to almost every

- 1> situation -- real life, as well as cyberspace. These reules [rules] might
1> seem kind of obvious to you, but they're important. They willl [will] help
2> you and your friends['] Internet experience by [be] productive, as well as fun.

Don't break any laws. Cyberspace is an extension of the real world. Just because you're dealing with computers and not people (at least not directly), it doesn't mean the law no longer applies. If it's illegal in the real world, it's probably illegal in cyberspace.

- Be polite. You've certainly heard the saying "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.["] It's true not only when you're talking to someone face-to [face-to-face,] but also when you're talking to them on the Web. Being polite doesn't just include what you say. It also covers how you say it, and to whom. If you use humor or sarcasm in your 1> wirting, [writing,] be sure the recipient is going to like your sense of 2> humor[.] Otherwise, you might offend the person. And never send an e-mail when you're angry or upset! It will probably show in your message, and you may hurt someone else's feelings.

Be careful of flames and flame wars. A "flame" refers to any insulting message. Nearly everyone receives a flame sooner or later. The question becomes what to do with them. The best move is to just ignore them. If, however, you feel the flame is worth a response, your reply may start a flame war, where the insults continue back and forth. In these situations, everybody loses.

- Be patient. Everybody was new to the Internet at one time or another! Be 1> paritient [patient] with those who are new. If someone shows poor

Netiquette,
